

AN INSIDE LOOK BEHIND THE SCENES

As America approaches its 250th birthday, the Economic War Room® marks its 400th episode by returning to the ideas, stories, artifacts, and convictions that shaped our mission. For more than two decades, Kevin Freeman has warned that America's enemies do not view markets, currency, supply chains, medicine, technology, and public confidence as mere aspects of the marketplace; they view them as weapons in a larger battlespace.

This Economic Battle Plan™ looks behind the scenes at the principles driving that mission: exposing economic warfare, advancing practical solutions rooted in sound money, and calling Americans back to the faith and stewardship required for national renewal. The goal is not simply to understand the threats facing America, but to recognize the tools, responsibilities, and moral foundations needed to defend liberty and prosperity for future generations. In Episode 400, Kevin reminisced about the journey and provided a message of inspiration.

In this briefing we will discuss the following:

- » Economic Warfare and the Long-Term Battle Against America
- » Transactional Gold and Silver as a Practical Path to Financial Sovereignty
- » Faith, Stewardship, and the Moral Foundation of America's Renewal

YOUR MISSION: Arm yourself with the clarity to recognize economic warfare, the practical tools to protect financial sovereignty, and the faith-driven stewardship needed to participate in America's renewal.

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE

- » Economic warfare affects your daily life.
Economic warfare is not limited to sanctions, tariffs, or Wall Street conflict. It includes threats to currency, supply chains, medicine, energy, technology, markets, and public trust. When adversaries target America's economic foundations, families feel the consequences through inflation, shortages, instability, higher costs, and reduced freedom.

» America's enemies do not separate markets from national security.

What Americans often see as normal commerce, adversaries may view as a battlefield. Modern conflict includes finance, trade, information, cyber systems, pharmaceutical dependency, and access to essential goods. Understanding this helps citizens interpret global events more accurately and support policies that defend American sovereignty.

» Sound money is a practical issue, not just a political theory.

Transactional gold and silver restore precious metals as usable money and legal tender, rather than treating them only as collectibles or long-term investments. This matters because fiat volatility, cashless systems, inflation, and centralized financial control can affect how freely citizens save, spend, and transact.

» Stewardship determines whether liberty survives.

Stewardship means responsibly managing what has been entrusted to us: personal finances, property, families, communities, institutions, and the nation itself. A free society depends on citizens who understand ownership, responsibility, and the principle of sowing good seeds in order to reap a good harvest.

» National renewal requires more than policy.

America's founders understood that human wisdom alone could not hold the nation together. Prayer, humility, moral clarity, private ownership, and dependence on God are not side issues. They are part of the foundation that makes liberty sustainable.

1. Economic Warfare and the Long-Term Battle Against America

Economic warfare is the deliberate use of financial, commercial, industrial, cyber, monetary, and supply-chain tools to weaken a nation without relying on conventional military force. It is how adversaries attack confidence, disrupt markets, manipulate dependency, and seek leverage over the systems that make America free, prosperous, and secure.

For more than two decades, Economic War Room® has warned that America's enemies do not view economics as neutral. They understand that markets, currency, medicine, debt, technology, energy, trade, and supply chains can all become weapons. That warning became unmistakable after a trip to Moscow roughly 20 years ago, when the intentions of foreign adversaries became clear.

“We started about 20 years ago, actually. Russell Lake, who's one of my partners, and I were invited by Vladimir Putin into Moscow, and we went there, and that's where we learned about economic warfare. Putin was planning to take America down.”

—Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

That experience became part of a much larger body of work, including Pentagon research, national-security briefings, and years of documented threats from Russia, China, Iran, communism, globalism, and internal weakness.

The message was not always popular because economic warfare often hides in plain sight. A cyberattack on a military institution, dependency on China for medicine, a hostile strategy against the dollar, the manipulation of markets, or ideological pressure inside American institutions may appear disconnected. Taken together, they reveal a coordinated battle over sovereignty.

China remains one of the clearest examples. Control over medicines and supply chains creates national-security risk because access to essential goods can be used as leverage. Cyber threats, pandemic lessons, human organ harvesting, and broader CCP strategy reveal a regime that should not be treated as merely another competitor in a normal marketplace.

“Is the CCP at War with America? Absolutely. The answer is yes.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

History also proves these battles can be won. The Reagan administration understood the power of economic warfare and used strategic pressure to help defeat Soviet communism. The fall of the Berlin Wall was not merely a political moment; it represented the collapse of a system that had been challenged morally, economically, and strategically.

That lesson matters because communism and related ideological threats are not gone. They have reappeared in new forms through cultural pressure, globalist systems, anti-property ideas, and internal division.

Foreign adversaries are dangerous, but internal weakness may be even more dangerous. A nation that forgets its principles can be weakened from within before it fully recognizes the external attack. That is why Americans must learn to see the economic battlefield clearly.

- » Debt can become leverage.
- » Trade can become dependency.
- » Currency can become control.
- » Technology can become a weapon.
- » Medicine can become a pressure point.
- » Public confidence can become a target.

The Economic War Room shelves are lined with books and artifacts that explain and address the challenges, highlighting victories, and remembering friends and patriots.

Recognizing the battle space is only the first step. The next step is advancing practical solutions that restore resilience, protect sovereignty, and give citizens tools to defend their financial freedom.

Attention: America must stop treating economic threats as isolated events and start recognizing them as part of a long-term battle against national sovereignty.

2. Transactional Gold and Silver as a Practical Path to Financial Sovereignty

If America's enemies target currency, markets, supply chains, and financial confidence, then Americans need practical tools that restore resilience. Economic War Room exists not merely to identify the threats, but to advance solutions. One of the most important of those solutions is transactional gold and silver.

Transactional gold and silver means restoring gold and silver to practical use as money. This is different from simply owning precious metals as an investment, collectible, or long-term hedge. It is about making gold and silver usable for everyday transactions, supported by state-level legal tender laws and modern financial technology. In simple terms, it reconnects money with real value.

“G. Edward Griffin (author of The Creature from Jekyll Island) was on our show. He said, we have the answer to the Federal Reserve problem. It's called transactional gold and silver.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

This matters because America faces serious monetary risks. Fiat currency—money not backed by a physical commodity—depends on confidence in the issuing authority. This confidence is eroded when Inflation eats away at purchasing power and excessive debt weakens national flexibility. Many also fear that a cashless world would create new forms of centralized financial control.

These and many other Federal Reserve concerns have caused many Americans to ask whether the current monetary system truly protects savers, workers, families, and states.

Gold and silver have historically served as money because they are scarce, durable, divisible, and widely recognized as stores of value. They are not created by political decree, and they do not depend on the same kind of trust required by paper promises. That is why sound money is not merely a theory. It is a practical defense against the loss of purchasing power and financial independence.

“We’re here not just to diagnose the problems, but also to come up with solutions.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

The momentum is already visible at the state level. Arkansas led the way, followed by Florida, Louisiana, Texas, Missouri, and Utah. Utah’s role is especially significant because its Legal Tender Act helped establish the foundation for this movement, and later precious metals work continued the practical development of the idea.

These efforts show that transactional gold and silver is not just an abstract proposal. It is moving through legislatures, gaining real-world traction, and creating a path for states to protect financial sovereignty.

Financial sovereignty means the ability of individuals, families, and states to retain meaningful control over money and transactions. In an age of inflation, digital systems, centralized platforms, and potential restrictions on cash, that sovereignty matters. A voluntary, constitutional option to transact in gold and silver gives citizens a practical alternative without requiring the immediate replacement of the dollar.

This is the heart of the strategy. Economic threats require economic answers. If adversaries attack financial freedom, then citizens need tools rooted in tangible value, personal choice, and state-level action. Transactional gold and silver is not passive protection. It is proactive stewardship.

“Our shelves are lined with books containing economic, monetary, and civilization history. That history must be remembered because it instructs the future.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

The symbol is simple, but the meaning is significant. Gold and silver represent tangible security in a world increasingly built on digital promises, paper systems, and centralized control. They remind us that financial freedom must be defended with practical tools, not just good intentions.

Transactional gold and silver naturally leads to a larger question: what kind of people will steward liberty well enough to preserve it? Sound money matters, but money alone cannot renew a nation. America also needs the moral, spiritual, and civic foundations that make freedom sustainable.

Attention: Transactional gold and silver offer a voluntary, practical, state-level path for citizens to protect financial freedom in an age of fiat risk, inflation, and centralized control.

3. Faith, Stewardship, and the Moral Foundation of America’s Renewal

Money cannot renew a nation. Economic freedom must be joined to moral responsibility, private ownership, prayer, and stewardship. A nation may have strong markets, advanced technology, abundant resources, and the right policy ideas, but if it loses humility, courage, and faith, its prosperity will not endure.

Stewardship means responsibly caring for what has been entrusted to us. That includes property, wealth, family, community, institutions, and the nation itself. America is not merely a place to receive benefits. It is a nation to preserve, defend, cultivate, and pass on. This is why financial stewardship, civic stewardship, and spiritual stewardship are inseparable.

“We teach a man to sow seeds and to reap harvests. And that’s really what economics is all about. Sowing seeds and reaping harvest.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

The principle of sowing and reaping is simple, but it reaches every part of national life. A harvest does not appear by accident. It comes from planting the right seeds, cultivating them, protecting them, and waiting faithfully for the result.

Families, businesses, communities, and nations all reap what they sow. If America sows liberty, sound money, responsibility, courage, truth, and faith, it can reap renewal. If it sows dependency, division, debt, moral confusion, and surrender, it will reap decline.

Private ownership is central to this lesson. The Plymouth Colony learned this when communal ownership failed to produce the necessary harvest. When everything was shared in common, incentives broke down. But when private ownership and stewardship were restored, people understood their responsibility to plant, work, build, and provide.

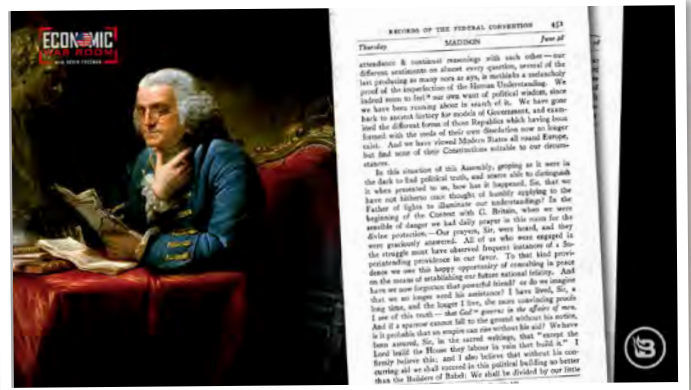

That same principle still applies today. A free people must be responsible enough to steward freedom.

“They learned it when they tried socialism. They said, well, we’ll just share everything in common. And nobody wanted to plant seeds. But when they had private ownership, really stewardship, people understood the concept.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

This is not only an economic principle. It is a spiritual one. The prayer garden and empty cross at Liberty Hawk Ranch are reminders that America’s battle is not merely financial, political, or strategic. It is moral and spiritual.

Twenty-five years ago, a prayer at a pro-life rally helped begin the journey that led to the cross, the prayer garden, and a place dedicated to seeking God’s wisdom for the future of America.

That dependence on God is not new. Benjamin Franklin understood it at the Constitutional Convention when the founders were divided and uncertain about the future. America’s founding generation faced foreign threats, internal disagreement, and the possibility that the project of self-government could fail.

Franklin’s call for prayer was a recognition that human wisdom alone could not build or preserve a republic.

“If this nation is to overcome the economic war that we’re facing and all the wars that we’re facing, we’re going to need that prayer moment with God.” –Kevin D. Freeman, CFA, D.Sc. (h.c.)

Prayer is not a retreat from action. It is the foundation for right action. Faith does not eliminate strategy; it orders it. Stewardship does not mean passivity; it requires citizens to work, build, defend, teach, invest, and pray.

America’s 250-year history is not as distant as it may seem. The blessings we inherited were handed down by people who sowed seeds they did not fully live to harvest. Our responsibility is to do the same.

That is the deeper mission of Economic War Room. We expose the battle space, advance practical solutions, and call citizens back to the moral foundation that makes liberty sustainable.

The economic war will not be won by policy alone. It will be won by a people who understand sound money, private ownership, prayer, and faithful stewardship.

The Economic War Room shelves also contain accounts of history, biographies, and wisdom from patriot and leaders in the past as well as modern day heroes, many of whom have been guests on the show.

Attention: America's renewal depends on citizens who return to prayer and biblical stewardship, sowing good seeds that produce prosperity for their families and preserve liberty for the nation.
