BORN TO OWN: THE POWER OF COMPOUND GROWTH

Trump Accounts represent a significant shift from short-term financial assistance toward long-term ownership. Available to eligible American children, these accounts pair a federal seed investment with decades of potential compound growth, giving families an opportunity to begin building wealth from birth. By investing in American businesses and allowing additional family contributions, the program can help transform children from passive participants in the economy into owners with a direct stake in the nation's prosperity. The opportunity, however, should be evaluated with both optimism and accountability. Corporate voting power, limited investment choices, immigration incentives, federal debt, taxation, inflation, and market risk all affect whether Trump Accounts achieve their full potential. These concerns are not reasons to reject the program, but reasons to improve it. This Economic Battle Plan™ explains how families can use Trump Accounts wisely, identifies reforms that could strengthen the program, and explores additional tools—including precious metals and private-market access—that could help Americans create, protect, and pass on multi-generational wealth.

WATCH NOW

In this briefing we will discuss the following:

- » Trump Accounts: Building Generational Wealth Through Ownership, Compound Growth, and Long-Term Financial Stewardship
- » Strengthening Trump Accounts: Corporate Governance, Birthright Citizenship, National Debt, and Policy Reforms to Protect Families
- » Expanding American Ownership: Gold, Silver, Private Markets, and Practical Steps to Build and Preserve Multi-Generational Wealth

YOUR MISSION: Claim the available seed investment for every eligible child, harness the power of long-term compounding, and integrate Trump Accounts into a broader financial strategy built around disciplined saving, informed stewardship, and generational ownership. At the same time, advocate for values-aligned investment choices, responsible funding, and policy reforms that protect American families and strengthen the program for future generations.

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE

- Trump Accounts can give working families a meaningful ownership stake in the American economy. Families that own productive assets benefit from growth and compounding, while those without appreciating assets often struggle to build lasting wealth.
- Children possess a financial advantage adults can never recover: time. Beginning with a $1,000 seed investment and adding consistent contributions can allow decades of compound growth to transform modest savings into substantial long-term wealth.
- Understanding the program's limitations helps families use it wisely. Taxes, market volatility, inflation, withdrawal rules, and the influence of large index-fund managers should all be considered when coordinating Trump Accounts with Roth IRAs, traditional IRAs, 529 plans, and other investments.
- Thoughtful reforms can protect the program's purpose. Expanding access to biblically responsible investments, addressing potential citizenship-related incentives, and ensuring honest fiscal stewardship can strengthen a promising policy without abandoning its central mission.
- Creating wealth is only the first step; families must also preserve it. Diversification into assets such as gold and silver, along with responsible access to private-market opportunities, could help families defend purchasing power and participate more fully in America's future economic growth.

1. Trump Accounts: Building Generational Wealth Through Ownership, Compound Growth, and Long-Term Financial Stewardship

Trump Accounts are built on a simple but transformative idea: every eligible American child should begin life with an ownership stake in the American economy. Eligible children receive a federally funded $1,000 seed investment that is placed in low-cost U.S. stock market index funds, while families may contribute up to the annual contribution limit to accelerate long-term growth. Rather than emphasizing consumption or short-term assistance, the program encourages parents and grandparents to think like long-term stewards—building assets that can appreciate over decades rather than simply funding today's expenses.

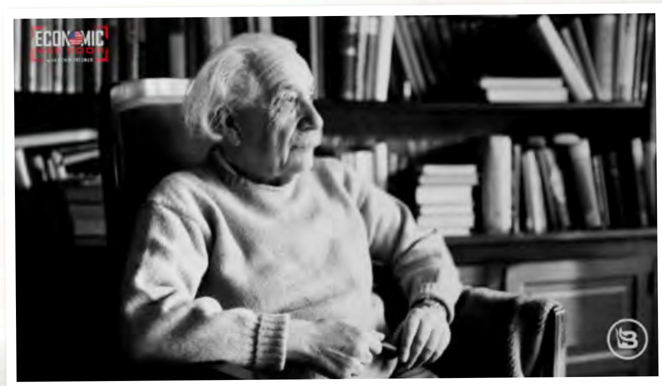
The true power of the program is not the government's initial contribution—it is time. Compound growth allows investment returns to generate additional returns year after year, creating exponential rather than linear growth. A newborn possesses the one financial advantage no adult can ever recover: decades for compound interest to work. Historical illustrations demonstrate how even modest investments, given enough time, can become substantial wealth. While no future returns are guaranteed, beginning at birth gives families an extraordinary opportunity to harness one of the most powerful forces in investing.

A simple rule makes the point. At the stock market's long-run historical return, money roughly doubles about every seven years—one dollar becomes two in seven years, four in fourteen, eight in twenty-one, and the doublings only grow from there.

Using the S&P 500's historical average return, the government's own illustrations at TrumpAccounts.gov show the $1,000 seed, with nothing added, reaching roughly $15,000 by age twenty-seven and about a quarter of a million dollars by age fifty-five. A family that contributes the maximum during the eligible years—about $90,000 of its own money over eighteen years, then never adds another dime—could see a single account approach roughly $30 million by age sixty-seven. Every family lands somewhere between those two numbers.

These are future dollars, and honesty requires the asterisk: after a lifetime of inflation, $30 million might spend more like $3 to $5 million in today's money—still life-changing, but a reminder of what the printing press quietly takes. Past performance never guarantees future results, markets fall as well as rise, and these are illustrations rather than promises. Verify the figures yourself at TrumpAccounts.gov.

> "Albert Einstein is said to have called compound interest the eighth wonder of the world... A baby has the one thing that the rest of us can never buy back. They have time." –Kevin Freeman



Trump Accounts also represent a broader shift in how we think about economic opportunity. The greatest divide in America is increasingly not between those who earn more and those who earn less, but between those who own appreciating assets and those who do not.

Families who participate in long-term ownership benefit from the growth of American businesses, while those without assets often struggle to build lasting financial security. By giving children an ownership stake from birth, Trump Accounts seek to place millions of Americans on the wealth-building side of that divide.

Historical projections using long-term market averages illustrate just how significant this opportunity can become. A single $1,000 seed investment left untouched for decades has the potential to grow many times over, while consistent family contributions throughout childhood can dramatically amplify those results.

These projections are not promises—markets fluctuate, inflation reduces purchasing power, and past performance never guarantees future returns—but they demonstrate what disciplined investing and long-term ownership can make possible.

> "The deepest divide in this country isn't income, it's ownership. The wealthy own assets that compound while they sleep. Too many families own nothing that grows." –Kevin Freeman

At the same time, wise stewardship requires realistic expectations. Trump Accounts eventually convert into traditional IRAs, meaning future withdrawals may be subject to taxation. They should therefore be viewed as one component of a broader financial strategy alongside Roth IRAs, traditional IRAs, 529 education savings plans, and other investment vehicles. Families should also recognize that private philanthropy is already expanding the program's impact, with organizations and donors pledging additional contributions that can further strengthen a child's financial foundation.

Ultimately, Trump Accounts are about far more than investment returns. They encourage a culture of ownership, responsibility, and long-term thinking. A nation in which millions of children begin life as owners rather than merely consumers is a nation that strengthens financial independence, personal stewardship, and economic resilience. Those principles naturally lead to the next question: How can a promising program like this be strengthened even further to better protect families and maximize its long-term impact?

The scale of that private giving is striking. Michael and Susan Dell have pledged $6.25 billion to add $250 to the accounts of some 25 million children—directed at children born before 2025, who missed the federal seed, in ZIP codes with median household income at or below $150,000.

Ray and Barbara Dalio have joined with a grant covering roughly 300,000 children in Connecticut, and a growing list of major employers, including BlackRock and BNY, have pledged to match the $1,000 seed for their employees' newborns. This is the model worth celebrating: not government doing everything, and not billionaires lecturing everyone, but private capital quietly investing in the next generation of Americans.

Attention: Generational wealth is built through ownership, disciplined stewardship, and the extraordinary power of time—not simply through higher income.

2. Strengthening Trump Accounts: Corporate Governance, Birthright Citizenship, National Debt, and Policy Reforms to Protect Families

Trump Accounts have the potential to become one of the most significant wealth-building initiatives in modern American history. But the strength of any public policy depends not only on its purpose, but also on its design. Rather than asking whether Trump Accounts should exist, the better question is how they can be improved to maximize benefits for American families while minimizing unintended consequences. Three areas deserve particular attention: whose values guide the investments, who ultimately receives the benefit, and who ultimately pays the bill.

The first issue is corporate governance and investment choice. Trump Accounts currently invest through a limited selection of broad-market index funds managed by a handful of the nation's largest asset managers, including BlackRock, Vanguard, and State Street. While index investing has lowered costs and broadened market participation, it has also concentrated an unprecedented amount of shareholder voting power in the hands of relatively few institutions.

Those firms cast votes on corporate directors, executive compensation, shareholder resolutions, and governance policies on behalf of millions of investors who have little direct influence over those decisions. Even Jack Bogle, the creator of the index fund, cautioned that such concentration could eventually work against the national interest.

For many families, the concern extends beyond economics to values. Millions of Americans prefer biblically responsible or values-based investment options that seek to align their investments with deeply held convictions. Such funds already exist and represent a substantial and growing marketplace. Expanding the Trump Account investment menu to include these options would allow parents—not large institutions—to determine how their children's investments reflect their own principles.

"A newborn's account should never be quietly forced into someone else's politics… Whose values is it? Whose babies and whose bill?" –Kevin Freeman

The second issue involves birthright citizenship and the federal seed investment. Because Trump Accounts provide taxpayer-funded investments to eligible American citizens, combining the program with existing birthright citizenship policies creates an economic incentive that some argue could encourage birth tourism and other forms of immigration abuse.

The concern is not directed toward legal immigrants who follow established pathways to citizenship, but toward individuals or organizations that exploit legal loopholes for financial benefit. If the goal is to provide a gift to American families, policymakers should ensure that the program cannot be manipulated in ways that undermine public confidence or divert resources from its intended beneficiaries.

The third issue is fiscal stewardship. Every $1,000 seed investment ultimately comes from taxpayer resources. With the national debt approaching $40 trillion and already exceeding the size of the U.S. economy, expanding a federally funded program without a sustainable funding mechanism raises legitimate long-term concerns.

More than one million newborns have already claimed the seed investment, representing well over $1 billion in commitments, with billions more expected as additional birth cohorts become eligible. Helping future generations build wealth is a worthy objective, but financing that effort by increasing the debt those same children may one day inherit presents an obvious contradiction.

> "So there are your three watch items. Whose values is it? Whose babies and whose bill? Notice that not one of them is a reason to scrap this. Every one is a reason to make it better." –Kevin Freeman

None of these concerns diminish the promise of Trump Accounts. Instead, they point toward practical improvements that could make the program stronger: expanding investment choice to include values-based options, closing opportunities for abuse, and identifying more sustainable methods of funding the government's seed investment. Good public policy is refined over time, and thoughtful stewardship requires strengthening worthwhile ideas rather than abandoning them.

Improving the program's structure is only part of the equation. The next step is ensuring that families have access to the broadest possible set of wealth-building tools—protecting purchasing power through sound money, expanding investment opportunities beyond public markets, and giving ordinary Americans greater access to the same ownership opportunities that have historically been reserved for the wealthy.

⚠ Attention: Strong public policy does not ignore legitimate concerns—it strengthens good ideas by protecting families, preserving stewardship, and expanding opportunities for long-term ownership.

3. Expanding American Ownership: Gold, Silver, Private Markets, and Practical Steps to Build and Preserve Multi-Generational Wealth

Trump Accounts represent an important first step toward expanding ownership, but they should not be the final destination. Building lasting wealth requires more than simply accumulating financial assets—it requires protecting purchasing power, participating in long-term economic growth, and ensuring that ordinary Americans have access to the same wealth-building opportunities that have historically been reserved for the largest institutions and wealthiest investors.

One opportunity to strengthen the program is by allowing families to allocate a portion of their Trump Accounts to physical gold and silver. Stocks have historically been among the greatest engines of long-term wealth creation, while precious metals have served as trusted stores of value for thousands of years through inflation, currency debasement, and financial uncertainty. These asset classes are not competitors—they are complements. One creates wealth through economic growth; the other helps preserve the purchasing power of that wealth.

This reflects a broader investment philosophy often described as a barbell strategy: owning productive assets on one side and durable stores of value on the other. Rather than relying entirely on paper assets issued within the same monetary system, families can combine growth with protection, creating portfolios that are designed not only to build wealth but also to defend it through changing economic conditions.

> "Give these children both [stocks and precious metals]. And you don't just build wealth, you defend it… Real money keeps its word." –Kevin Freeman

The second opportunity lies beyond the public stock market itself. Over the past several decades, the number of publicly traded American companies has declined dramatically, while many of the fastest-growing businesses—particularly in fields such as artificial intelligence, advanced technology, and space—remain privately held for much longer. As a result, much of the highest-growth phase of these companies often accrues to institutional investors and accredited individuals before ordinary Americans ever have an opportunity to participate.

If the goal is to create a true ownership society, that gap deserves attention. Expanding responsible access to private-market investments would allow more Americans to participate in the innovation driving tomorrow's economy instead of arriving only after much of the value has already been created. This remains one of the next frontiers in democratizing capital ownership and will be explored in greater depth in an upcoming Economic War Room episode focused specifically on expanding private-market access for everyday Americans.

> "Liberty. It turns citizens into owners and owners are much harder to push around. Security. A nation of stakeholders is stronger and steadier than a nation of dependents." –Kevin Freeman

The larger principle extends beyond finance. Scripture praises those who leave "an inheritance to their children's children," reminding us that building wealth for future generations is an act of stewardship rather than greed. Properly designed and continually improved, Trump Accounts can help cultivate a culture of ownership, responsibility, thrift, and long-term thinking.

When combined with disciplined investing, prudent diversification, and broader access to America's greatest wealth-building opportunities, they become more than a government program—they become a catalyst for strengthening families and, ultimately, the nation itself.

This vision does not end with Trump Accounts. It points toward a broader philosophy of expanding ownership, defending purchasing power, and equipping every American family with the tools to build and preserve generational wealth. For a deeper exploration of these themes and the broader economic and national security challenges facing the country, watch for Kevin Freeman's forthcoming book, The Four Horsemen of the American Apocalypse and Our Six Trials by Fire.

Attention: The strongest path to enduring prosperity combines early ownership, compound growth, sound money, and expanded access to America's greatest wealth-building opportunities—creating wealth that is not only built, but protected for generations to come.
